Tardive dyskinesia is a possible side effect of the use of antipsychotic drugs. This side effect includes involuntary movements of the facial muscles, tongue, and limbs.

Paragraph 2 *

I was watching an episode of Criminal Minds and in the episode there was a man who held six people hostage on a train. He was seeing things that other people couldn't see and believed that there was a special chip inside his arm that he wanted removed. He believed that the government was after him and didn't trust any law enforcement because he thought that they were working for the government. As the investigators were watching security footage of this man on the train, they saw his face muscles contract in a weird way.

Paragraph 3 *

This man holding these people hostage obviously had schizophrenia because he was delusional about having a chip in his arm and that the government was coming after him and he was having hallucinations. Antipsychotic drugs treat symptoms of schizophrenia. With the weird facial contractions he displayed, he had obviously been taking these antipsychotic drugs and got the side effect of tardive dyskinesia. Since I saw what it looks like to have tardive dyskinesia, it is easier for me to understand the term. If I hadn't watched this episode, it would be harder for me to understand what involuntary movements of the facial muscles meant.
